1. The Greek guerrillas who were sent to Czechoslovakia following the Grammos campaign were afflicted with physical disorders ostensibly resulting from a strange explosion, and were committed to various Czech hospitals.
2. It is reported that medical examinations and observation of the Grammos fighters, as well as the depositions submitted by the partisans to the Czechoslovak Ministry of Defense, have failed to clarify the nature of the explosion in Grammos.
3. A total of 8,000 Greeks including men, women, and children, are now said to be living in Czechoslovakia; the exact number of Grammos fighters, however, cannot be ascertained. When initial efforts to place the men in the agricultural work in the frontier area failed, these Greeks were assigned to three camps where they receive quarters, food, and a monthly allotment of 1,500 crowns for pocket money. The largest camp is at Svatoborice u Kyuova in Moravia, the second in the Orlici Mountains (Adlergebirge) in Bohemia, and the third is located along the Sazawa River.
